Armstrong, Hugh, and Armstrong, Pat. "A Working Majority: Employment and Unemployment for Canadian Women." In Society for the Study of Social Problems. Proceedings. 1981.

The labour force participation rate of Canadian women continues to rise rapidly. By 1980, over 50% of Canadian females were in the labour force, but over 8% of them were officially unemployed, and almost 25% of those with jobs found only part-time employment. Using labour force survey data and work history from interviews with 65 females in white collar jobs, features of women's participation are examined. Focus is on employer demand and the economic needs of women. Job creation has been concentrated in the traditional female occupations and industries, where most of the part-time work is found. More women have been hired, but more women are also in competition with each other within the female job ghetto. Since most women respond to the increased employer demand because they need the income, they find it difficult to disappear back into the home when they fail to find labour force employment. Some social policy implications of these developments in female labour force participation are considered.

Holmes, R. A. "Male-Female Earnings Differentials in Canada." In Journal of Human Resources 11 (Winter 1976): 109-117.

Female earnings as a percentage of male earnings varies directly with education level. With higher levels of education, females are better able to compete with males for higher paying jobs and are less likely to be forced into overcrowded occupations where their productivity and rate of pay is low. Overall, the potential lifetime earnings of female workers in Canada average only 41 percent of male potential earnings, but increases to 56 percent when an adjustment is made for factors such as weeks worked, occupation, marital status, and class of worker. The data suggests somewhat greater discrimination against women in Canada than in the U.S.

Presented is an explanation of the orgins and early development of the feminization process in clerical occupations. It is argued that the administrative revolution which swept major Canadian offices between the turn of the century and the depression precipitated a shift in the sex ratio of clerical occupations. Census data are used to trace the main contours of the historical development of the female clerical labor market. Four theoretical models - the consumer choice, reserve army of labour, demand, and segmentation models - are critically evaluated. A structural explanation of clerical feminization is presented. It is shown how the changing structure of the office and the clerical labor process during the administrative revolution underlay the feminization of clerical jobs. Three case studies provide supporting evidence.

A model of the labor force behaviour of married women is presented in which both individual and family decision making and macro labor market conditions are included. An unemployment variable and an index summarizing the ratio of expected available local job slots for women to the potential female labor force population are incorporated into a marginal utility analysis of the labor force behaviour of married women in Canada.
